The allegation was made in a New York Magazine article written by Lacey Flores, a former Nevada state representative and the 2014 Democratic nominee for Nevada lieutenant governor.

Flores wrote that she and Biden were waiting to take the stage during a rally in Las Vegas before the 2014 election. "I felt two hands on my shoulder. I froze. Why is the vice president of the United States touching me?" Flores wrote. "He proceeded to plant a big slow kiss on the back of my head."

Homeland Security Secretary Kirstjen Nielsen asked for volunteers from non-immigration agencies within her department, sent a letter to Congress late this past week requesting resources and broader authority to deport families faster, and she met with Central American and Mexican officials.

The efforts are being made while President Donald Trump is doubling down on threats to shutter the US-Mexico border entirely, a move that would have serious economic repercussions for both the US and Mexico but wouldn't stop migrants from crossing between ports. His administration also announced it was cutting aid to the Central American countries home to most of the migrants.

The plan was announced January 29, partially to deter false claimants from coming across the border. With a backlog of more than 700,000 immigration cases, asylum seekers can wait years for their cases to progress, and officials say some people game the system in order to live in the US.

Officials hope to have as many as 300 people returned per day by the end of the week, focusing particularly on those who come in between ports of entry, said the official, who had knowledge of the plans but was unauthorized to speak publicly and spoke to The Associated Press on condition of anonymity.

But the process so far has been slow-going, and such a sizeable increase may be difficult to achieve. The plan has already been marred by confusion, scheduling glitches and an inability by some attorneys to reach their clients. In San Ysidro
